delightful book by an intelligent, charming young lady named Hailey. Last summer she visited Paris with her parents and her two older brothers. They stayed in a family apartment in a hotel and visited the Eiffel Tower, the Arc d'Triomphe, Versailles, and the Louvre. They also spent time walking around, riding the open-top buses, and playing in some of Paris' many parks. Hailey expected France to be different from the U.S., but she was relieved that her Dad was wrong about one thing: there IS ketchup for the French fries. Peanut butter is not to be found, but she was happy to do without it in exchange for the superb French chocolate ice cream and hot chocolate. This is not a children's picture book, although there are some interesting pictures. It is a child's eye view of a famous city and contains a surprising amount of very practical information, especially if you are visiting Paris with your family. I will never think of Paris in quite the same way again. Thanks, Hailey!

Just like looking at a friend's photo book of a trip to Paris narrated by their second grade child. Helpful hints were inserted by Dad and Mom with topics like lunch reservations at the Eiffel Tower (make them a month in advance) ordering no-contract basic cell phones that work in Europe, and more. One question I had for dad was how a sentence on location 316-17 ended as it reads "He found a copy of the map he could read on the iPad so we could search for different places and see where the..." because I am most interested in visiting Paris one day and appreciate what info was given. Very good book and thank you!

Why I Like Paris

Before I started second grade, I traveled to Paris with my family for a summer vacation. This was the first time I went outside of the country. I had a great time there and I took some pictures and wrote down some information so that I could share it with you about going to Paris when you are a kid. In Paris I got to see some really cool things that we do not have at home like: The Eiffel Tower The Louvre The Arc De Triomphe The big department stores The French restaurants (there are some in the Eiffel Tower) The parks (with playgrounds) I think Paris is a great place to visit with your family. You will like it too!
