Stuart P. Boehmig : Pittsburgh's South Side (PA) (Images of America) before purchasing it in order to gage whether or not it would be worth my time, and all praised Pittsburgh's South Side (PA) (Images of America):

Long story, my uncle was an artist who was painting a picture of the steeple from my grandmother's kitchen window. Lightning hit the steeple and the church burned. We all ran around the corner, but by the time we got there, the steeple had collapsed. I was given the painting by my aunt after my uncle died.0 of 0 people found the following review helpful. Very limited range of photosBy KAM Really just a compilation of available photos from Carnegie Library's Photo collection in the Pennsylvania room. It would have been nice if the photos covered ALL of the Suuth Side. Very disappointed.0 of 0 people found the following review helpful. True!By Michelle JonesGreat info in a small book. Husband's mother even recognized some of the people in the high school photo! She even learned about things she was not aware of.

In 1763, King George III granted 3,000 acres of bottomland on the south side of the Monongahela River to Maj. Gen. John Ormsby for his service in capturing Fort Duquesne during the French and Indian War. Just 100 years later, this flat river plain became the center of the Workplace of the World. Powerful industrial giants such as B. F. Jones, James Laughlin, and Henry W. Oliver were drawn to the area, making it the heart of the Industrial Revolution. Immigrants came in droves from Germany, Ireland, Scotland, England, and later from central and Eastern Europe. They crowded Carson Street with the sights and sounds of different languages, customs, and fashions. These were the people who made the steel and iron that built America. Pittsburghs South Side is their story, a story of glass factories, steel mills, incline planes, trolley cars, saloons, and the crowded row houses where they raised their families.

About the AuthorStuart P. Boehmig, a retired resident of the South Side, is a fifth-generation Pittsburgher. His ancestors have lived in Troy Hill, Lawrenceville, and the South Side. He developed an interest in the areas history while working in the Jones and Laughlin Mill as a college student.
