When scoping out routes -- snow was very heavy at times and a couple of the cols we had hoped to use were closed -- we showed the map to Tourist Bureaus in five different towns. In each case, the agents were fascinated with the map, commenting favorably on accuracy and in a couple of cases on the waterproof paper. Many of the towns have long, compound names (the result of the consolidation of a number of smaller towns), and National Geographic was unfailingly accurate. We used Avery Rectangular Color Coding Labels to mark out a route each day, highlighting interesting stops, and the different colors were excellent in highlighting various positions, depending on what color was predominate at each location on the map itself. The labels were easy to remove with no residue UNLESS the map was wet. (The French side of the Pyrenees receives a great deal of rain so the map did often get wet.) So, we were very careful to dry both the map and the coding label before removing the coding label; when we forgot, we found that the residue could be rubbed off after it was completely dry without harming the map surface. Overall, these labels were a very useful aid to using the map during the drive. We also used the same colored label to mark the page of our guide books for each stop we planned to make, a great cross checking system when deciding whether to actually stop when we were running a little late at one point or another. Our favorites guides for this journey were the Michelin Green Guide Roussillon Pyrenes (Green Guide/Michelin) and Gascony, the Pyrenees Toulouse, 5th (Country Regional Guides - Cadogan). Both of us are fluent in English and one of us is fluent in French; the labels worked great in both guides and in both languages. :) One other excellent feature: the map is printed on two sides so that it can cover a great expanse of territory and yet display quite amount of information of an exceedingly complex part of the world. Nonetheless, it folds up into a very compact package, about the size of the Green Guide, but able to be open to the area we were traversing. At the request of a reader, I've posted a picture of the map, complete with a few of the coding labels in place. The Pyrenees are a fascinating place to visit, and this fine map enhanced an already thrilling experience. Robert C. Ross May 2013
